About the program

In this program I will show you the best and the correct techniques in order to learn one of the most famous static elements in this sport. The program contains 3 steps, each one has a 4 day training routine and a few photos to show you the exercises, giving you the opportunity to understand everything faster and easier.

Maltese Form

Maltese form

There two main types of form in the maltese that are similar to the planche. They are separating on maltese with hollow back and maltese without hollow back. The form of every single man starts to develops from the beginning of training for maltese.

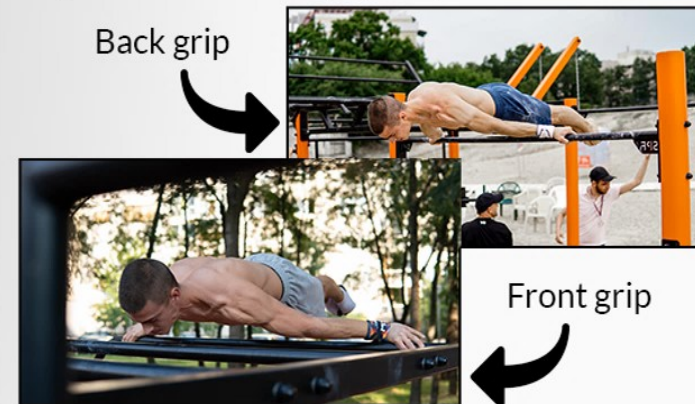

The form also can be structured from the type of the human body. The most important thing is to listen to your body and to let it guide you.

Maltese Grip

Maltese grip

There are many different types of grip for the maltese. And the most common are (High bar) front grip and back grip. In Street workout there are many different types of grip. The maltese can be done on high bar, p-bar, floor and paralets. And about the maltese variations - the maltese can be done on wrists, on fingers (2 fingers or 5 fingers on each hand). About the answer of the question "Which grip should I use to start training maltese?!". The answer is front grip on high bar and normal grip for paralets.

Maltese Hold

How long the minimum hold must be? The minimum hold of one element must be 3 seconds. One of the most important things to perform a correct hold is to keep the body in perfect horizontal line and to be neither above nor below that line.

In my opinion this should be clean form!

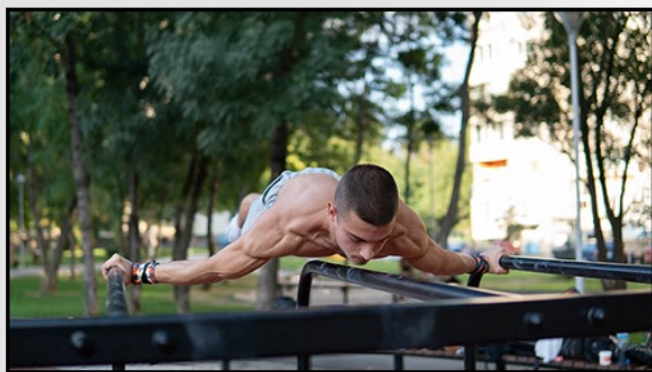

Resistance Band

One of the most common methods of learning maltese is to train it with resistance bands. There are a few types of resistance bands. In the beginning you should use stronger resistance band (with higher tension). After some time and progress the resistance band must be replaced with a weaker one (With lower tension).

Training Volume

I recommend that the training process of planche to be 4 times a week. The rest between the attempts should be from 3 to 4 minutes depending on how you feel your body. The desire for progress should be focused on the first attempts of the program for the day.

Maltese pressing

Maltese pressing

The most common types of pressing for maltese are pushing and pulling. The pushing way can be applied when the parallelts are in fixed position or holded by people (in static position). After the parallelts are in this position when you are doing maltese they are going away from the body.

When you are doing maltese with the pulling technique the parallelts pull to the body. This method is proper when there is no one to hold them for you and they are moving.

(It`s not about the maltese press it`s about how you are pressing the parallelts for hold!)
